Carving out a home office that not only inspires creativity, but also helps you reach peak productivity when you're working from your house can be relatively easy. And it doesn't require a dedicated room or ample square footage either. When you're thinking about layout ideas, get creative with the space you already have—even if that means making use of a spare corner in your bedroom or an unused closet.

Think strategically about how to accommodate two desks

If two people will be working together at the same time, it's important to think about the best furniture arrangement, says Josh Hildreth of Josh Hildreth Interiors. "For collaboration, I love the idea of partners desks—they can be very beautiful and just the sight of one makes me want to get to work." But if the work is individual, think about ways to arrange furniture that promotes focus and concentration instead. "Perhaps desks located in opposite corners or using a screen or curtain to create a zone of privacy and concentration," says Hildreth. "If the desk itself is going to be shared by members of a family, consider having a bookshelf that can hold attractive storage baskets or containers as a way of storing incomplete work."
